Baylor grad explores communication in London before entering the workforce

Recent Baylor alum Hailey Soupiset spent the summer in London studying communication to deepen her knowledge before law school and entering the workforce.

Soupiset, who graduated with a degree in political science and a minor in communication this past August, discovered the appeal of living and studying abroad after her time in London.

“I never really considered studying abroad or living abroad as something that I wanted in my future,” she said. “And now it's something that I am looking at with different law schools and what kind of study abroad programs they offer.”

Her experience abroad not only expanded her academic understanding, but also gave her a new perspective on navigating life with a sense of purpose.

“There's something about being in a city and seeing people moving with direction and purpose in a very external way that makes you feel like, internally, you also have a sense of direction and purpose,” Soupiset said.

As she starts out in the workforce before attending law school, Soupiset reflects on how this journey has shaped her personal and professional outlook, making London an unexpected but significant part of her future plans.
